

Make your good dog better.

Simply slide the slip knotted ends around the legs of the bird you are using

We recommend using pigeons but you can use quail as well as chukar. Just be aware that the chukar may be strong enough to fly with the Flight Limiter attached. We suggest with strong pigeons and chukar that the flight feathers on one wing be removed so that the bird's flight characteristics are out of balance.

Using Your DOGS Flight Limiter

Once you've brought your Good Dog out and he's pointed the bird, flush it by tossing it into the air.

The dog sees the bird fly and you shoot your blank pistol. The difference here is that you can mark where the bird has landed, then come back for it to be used again.

It's also a good tool to break your dog from delayed chasing.

The Flight Limiter lets the bird fly until it can no longer carry the weight.

The bird wings its way back to the ground without injury. The weight holds it there to be easily relocated.

Sight Pointing

Sight pointing is as important as scent pointing and you can use the Flight Limiter as a way to keep your training birds from running into cover when you need to get your good dog accustomed to seeing birds out in the open. Exposing and training your young prospect on sight birds early in their career will lead to many shot birds during the season. This is also very helpful to field trialers, as pen raised quail tend to congregate out in the open at times. Many a good dog has been taken out by a bird standing out in the open.

Backing With Multiple Dogs

This is best done with training partners. Set three birds, evenly spaced, in a large circle with approximately 50 yards between birds. Check cord the lead dog in to point the first bird and have the other dogs come in to honor the pointing dog. Rotate birds and the lead dog so that each dog has an opportunity to point and back multiple times.

Don't Over-Do It

The key to training bird dogs is to repeat an exercise only a few times, making sure to end on a good note. But be sure to repeat the session each time you train. Make it fun - not boring - for your good dog.
